

INTRODUCTION

The debate on whether to arm Private Security officers has been a concern for the past three years and the matter took a significant step following the gazette of new regulations that will allow them to carry guns and arrest criminals.

The said regulations that are in line with the Private Security Regulation Act 2016 will see private security officers enjoy these privileges under the guidance of the Inspector General of Police.

Most importantly, the Government through the Private Security Regulatory Authority will guide on the issuance of firearms first through the fresh registration of all private security firms in the next six months to the provision of a standard curriculum for training security officers.
